In February 2008, it was announced that the six Guantanamo Bay detainees involved in the 9/11 terrorist attacks would be tried for their crimes by military commissions. All six men are said to have either participated directly in the 9/11 attack, or have provided services or money to facilitate the operation.

While it is certainly good news that the legal process will soon be getting underway, there are many question marks surrounding this case. For one, there are many criticisms of the way these men are to be tried. According to the Military Commissions Act passed by Congress last year, these men

It is uncertain what will come out of these trials, but it is certain that they will continue on for a few years. A decision will not be made quickly, and they will certainly carry over into the next president's term, which could prove interesting depending on the winner of this upcoming election. The death penalty is actively being pursued by the United
